Just a handful of Android TV boxes really What Google calls Android TV is more simply run a version of Android with the manufacturer's colors for a 4K screen. If you are buying one of the myriad Chinese-made boxes, we advise looking for one with a quad or eight-core processor, 2GB to 4GB of RAM and 16GB or more of storage (often confusingly labelled as 16GB or more of storage). Dual-band 2.4GHz and 5GHz Wi-Fi plus 4K support are also useful extras, but don't get too excited by claims of 6K or 8K support; until more TVs and streaming services support higher-than-4K resolutions, they are virtually meaningless and it's doubtful that the boxes have the horsepower to process all those pixels. The other thing to watch out for is software. We do not condone and are not responsible for the infringement of any intellectual property or other third-party rights and shall not be liable to any party as a result of any such content made available. Throw in support for Dolby Vision HDR, Dolby Atmos and DTS-X surround sound, and it's a regular AV powerhouse. The chip also handles real-time transcoding, so if you have a NAS drive full of files in different formats, you can stream them without a hitch. The same can be said of Kodi, but there are ways to download and install it and a range of other TV-friendly apps via sideloading or specific downloader apps. The entry-level Fire TV stick will do a lot, but with just 1GB of RAM, a quad-core CPU and 8GB of storage, it can feel underpowered. As with all these cheap Android TV products, you will need to sideload apps and may want to install your own version of Kodi but, with a few tweaks, this is an inexpensive way to get it up and running.
